Hi Everyone,

One of the questions we ask ourselves at Klutz is how can we teach creative confidence?

We've always believed we redefine the concept of failure. We teach kids (and adults!) to accept things not working as part of the process, not the end.

In our very first book, Juggling for the Complete Klutz, we start the book by teaching you how to drop the ball: "Step 1: THE DROP. Throw all three Bags into the air and making no effort to catch any of them, let them all hit the ground. This is an example of THE DROP."

You learn "the drop" because dropping the ball is not failure, it is just part of the process on the path to success. And with every attempt, you build creative confidence. You expand your thoughts and your problem solving skills. You realize you are resilient.

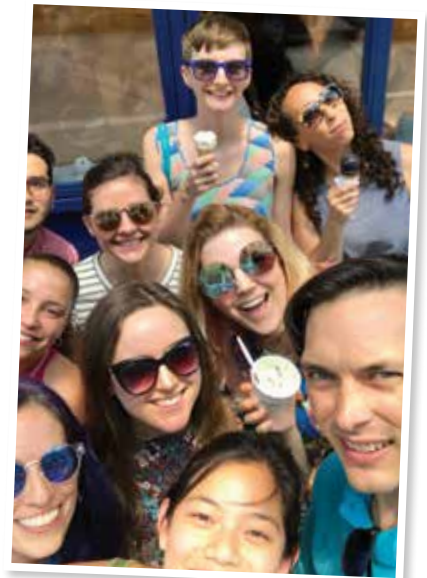

The same is true of the Maker Movement happening across the country, and actually, the world right now. Maker culture emphasizes learning through doing. It's about tinkering and creating, it's about encouraging experimentation and exploration. It's informal and motivated by fun and self-fulfillment. It doesn't matter what you make or why you make. The important thing is just the process of making something.

At Klutz, we have always been makers. Our mission is to build creative confidence in kids through amazing, funny, and just plain FUN activity products. We teach kids to explore, invent, create, and make. We teach kids that a dropped ball is no big deal as long as you pick it up again. We're excited to showcase what we do best in our new line of kits dedicated to the maker movement, as well as our tried-and-true kits guaranteed to inspire little makers and older kids alike.

Warmest,

Stacy

MAKER

LAB

WHAT IS A MAKER?

Makers are people who make things. It's that simple.

Makers CREATE things that are artistic, solve problems, are unique, or are just plain fun.

If you pick up these books and try to make any of the projects inside, you're a maker! You don't need special skills or snazzy certifications, but when you start out, you might make some mistakes, and you'll definitely have some questions. That's all part of learning to be a really good maker. Check in with your parents, teachers, and friends to see if they can help you find answers. Keep trying to build a project until it works. When something doesn't work, try to figure out WHY.

STAY CURIOUS!
