

The

BOOK

Case

An Emily Lime mystery

Dave Shelton

SCHOLASTIC INC. / NEW YORK

Text and illustrations copyright © 2018, 2019
by Dave Shelton

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920, by arrangement with David Fickling Books, Oxford, England. SCHOLASTIC and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

DAVID FICKLING BOOKS and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of David Fickling Books.

First published in the United Kingdom in 2018 by David Fickling Books,
31 Beaumont Street,
Oxford OX1 2NP.

davidficklingbooks.com

The publisher does not have any control over and does not assume any responsibility for author or third-party websites or their content.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without written permission of the publisher. For information regarding permission, write to Scholastic Inc., Attention: Permissions Department, 557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents are either the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously, and any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, business establishments, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data available

ISBN 978-1-338-32379-5

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 19 20 21 22 23

Printed in the U.S.A. 23

First edition, June 2019

Book design by Falcon Oast Graphic Art Ltd.

Excuse me, miss?"
"Yes?"

"Sorry to bother you, but a lady over on the other platform asked me to give you this."

Daphne Blakeway looked round from the timetable she had been examining to find that the man talking to her was a railway porter. He looked old—older, even, than his voice sounded—but harmless enough. He handed her a book. As it happened, Daphne was desperate for something new to read, so she took it from him almost without thinking.

“Oh,” she said. “But why? And who?” She scanned the other platform. “The young lady with the dog with the enormous ears?”

“Oh, no, miss. This was an older lady. Shortish, wide-ish, in a ratty old fur coat. And a hat—so I didn’t really get a good look at her ears.” The porter squinted across the track. “Can’t seem to spot her just at present. Said she was on her way to take the book to St. Rita’s herself, but then saw you—she recognized the uniform, you see—and wondered if you might save her the bother. You are going to St. Rita’s, aren’t you, miss?”

“Yes. I was meant to arrive there last night, actually, to start there today, but I got stuck in London when my onward train was canceled.”

“Oh yes, that accident outside of Paddington put everything in a right pickle. But would that be all right? The book, I mean. It’s for the library, she said.”

“Really?” Daphne took a closer look at the book. Her eyes widened as she took in the cover.

“Scarlet Fury: A Smeeton Westerby Mystery, by J. H.

Buchanan. It doesn't seem quite the usual sort of thing for a school library, I must say."

"Ah well, I suppose you could say that St. Rita's is not quite the usual sort of a school, miss."

"No? Oh, well, in any case, I'll be happy to take the book, of course. Oh, I say, do you know when the next train to Pelham comes in? Only I'm not sure if I've time for a visit to the tearoom."

The porter consulted his pocket watch, holding it at a variety of distances from his bespectacled eyes in an effort to get it in focus.

"Well, miss, let's see . . . Ah yes. Pelham train is due in any minute." He turned to squint away down the track, and indicated a plume of smoke in the middle distance. "See? Here it comes now. But you'll still have time to grab a bun or some such if you look sharp. Old Wilf—he's the conductor—he'll want to fill up his thermos before they set off again. He's a devil if he doesn't have his tea. You get yourself over there and sort yourself a bite to eat—you look like you could do with it. I'll get your suitcase on board, if you like."

“Oh, thank you!” Daphne raised her voice as the noise of the arriving train grew. “That’s very kind.” She dashed off to the tearoom, stuffing the book into her satchel as she went, leaving the porter to heave her small but weighty case into an empty carriage. When she returned, with some dainty sandwiches in a paper bag, the porter ushered her in through an open carriage door.

“There you go, miss. Your case is up on the rack there. You have a safe journey, now.” He shut the door after her.

Daphne poked her head out the open window. “Thank you so much.”

“A pleasure, miss,” said the porter. “And the best of luck to you at that school of yours.” He gave her a little wave, turned, and walked away. “Lord knows you’ll need it.”

But these last muttered words were lost in the noise of the train getting up steam. The porter raised a smile and tipped his hat to old Wilf the conductor, passing the other way with his freshly refilled thermos. Then, after a suitable pause, he gave a blast on his whistle, waved his flag, and watched as the train pulled away.

Daphne looked out at him from the carriage. She'd had a rotten journey so far, but this funny old man had cheered her with his small kindnesses. She watched him now, half-hidden by steam, patiently helping another passenger—a tall breathless man, who Daphne assumed had just missed catching the same train. Perhaps, she thought, her day had just gotten better, and it would all go smoothly from now on. And as the train picked up speed, she turned her attention to her sandwiches and the book, and she dared to smile a little.